TIMOTHY THE TERRIBLE

WALLY WEASEL yelped, "Wow! Gold!"

But as soon as he'd yelped it, Wally realized that he wanted to keep it a secret. So, when Coco Coyote came running up to him and squealed, "Gold? Did you say gold?" Wally answered casually, "What? No, not gold. I said 'cold.' The water's cold."

"Oh." The coyote, disappointed, turned away. "I thought you'd discovered gold."

"Ah ha, and so I have," murmured Wally Weasel to himself. "But no one must know about it except me. If anyone does find out about it, they'll be coming from miles around to get some for themselves. Then what would I be left with?"

So very quietly, very secretly, Wally went on digging in the narrow stream's edge. The bright gold-dust glinted in his shovel. He shoveled it into his pail. "A hundred dollars—" he was thinking, "a thousand dollars—a million dollars worth of gold!"

"Gold?" a voice beside him suddenly exclaimed.

"Uh — no — cold — cold water," said Wally quickly, hiding his pail behind him.

The squirrel pointed down into the stream. "What's that stuff glittering down there?"

"Uh . . . th-that's my gold necklace," Wally replied.

"Since when do you have a gold necklace?"

Wally was getting tired of questions, especially since he didn't have any answers. So he decided to get rid of the squirrel a fast way. "Say," said Wally, "did you know Timothy the Terrible is headed this way?"

"Who? Where?" The squirrel looked scared.

"You'd better hurry to that island upstream. You'll be safe there. Safe from Timothy the Terrible!"

"Wh-who is Timothy the Terrible?" stuttered the terrified squirrel.

"Oh, he's horrible," the weasel answered. "He's terrible! He has a big, green head and six feet!"

"EEEEK!" The squirrel waited to hear no more. In another second he had leaped from rock to rock across the stream to the island.

Chuckling, Wally went on with his gold digging. This time when he was interrupted, Wally had his routine all ready. Again he said, "Timothy the Terrible is coming soon. Better get on that island upstream before he reaches here!"

"Timothy the Terrible!" the chipmunk stuttered. "He sounds awful!"

"Oh, believe me, he is awful," Wally insisted. "You'd better rush."

And he went on collecting his gold dust. When a wolf appeared, Wally told him the same frightening story, and then he told it to a fox, and next, to a crab who started his long trek across the stream to join the dozens of animals on the island upstream. They were babbling frantically to each other in loud, frightened voices about Timothy the Terrible. Downstream Wally Weasel peacefully went on digging. Now a rabbit who had interrupted him, scurried onto the island. Then a tiger, who got too curious, was sent to the island. At last the little island got so full of animals that it could hold no more. Suddenly a very wise owl thought of something. . .

"Say, if Timothy the Terrible is so terrible, how come the guy who told us about it isn't scared of it?"

"Say, that's right." All the animals stared across the stream at the weasel, who was singing, now, as he dug. "He must be playing a trick on us!"

Feeling very foolish, the animals all began to file off of the island. The squirrel spoke up. "I think I know what he's up to—he must have found gold dust! That's why he didn't want us around!"

"What would we want of his gold?" the animals all agreed. "If he found it, it's his. He didn't have to go to all this trouble to get rid of us. We would've left him alone with his gold if he'd just explained it to us honestly. But being fibbed to is a different matter! We should certainly do something about that!

So the animals decided what to do: Tommy Tiger would dress up like Timothy the Terrible and give Wally a little of his own medicine. So they all helped Tommy create a terrible costume, even though no one knew exactly what Timothy the Terrible really looked like. With lots of green leaves stuck together with mud, they made a great, big head for Tommy and with some clay they fashioned two extra legs that hung from his sides by a rope slung across his back. When they had finished, Tommy really looked terrible.

All this time, Wally continued to dig and sing and sing and dig. Every once in a while he'd throw his head back and laugh. "Ha! Ha! Ha!" But the last time he threw his head back to laugh, he didn't laugh at all!

"YEOW!" yelped the frightened Wally, "TIMOTHY THE TERRIBLE!" and he jumped about three feet in the air before he hit the water and scurried over to the island.

"Ha ha ha ho ho ho!" all the animals on the island were holding their sides, they were laughing so hard. Wally Weasel stood on the shore of the island all wet and shaking with fright! It took him several seconds to realize that he had been tricked.

"Now go on back home and dig your gold—" Coco Coyote said, in a serious tone of voice, "—and don't ever fib to your friends again!" and he took off from the island to return to the mainland. All the other animals followed him—all except one—Wally Weasel. He just stood there all by himself, ashamed, until someone on the mainland yelled 'C'mon, Wally!" in such a friendly voice that he gathered up his pride and took off to join his friends. Wally Weasel had certainly learned his lesson!
